

Guardian Angels Meet President Bush

Wednesday, September 8, 2004

Guardian Angels who volunteered to assist victims of hurricane Frances met President Bush during his tour of Florida's Atlantic coast on Wednesday. The volunteers were assisting The Convoy of Hope, a Christian disaster relief program, by passing out water, ice, food, and supplies in Fort Pierce, Florida. The President thanked the Angels for their efforts, and asked about Curtis Sliwa, fondly referred to as "Angel One" by his volunteers. The president was happy to talk to the Angels, and accepted their thanks for the Volunteer Award he sent them in May of this year.

"You know, out of these catastrophes the spirit of America really shines, and that spirit is neighbor helping neighbor," Bush said. The Guardian Angels are happy to be a part of the spirit of America by reaching out to help the people of Florida during this crisis.
